"OUR UNFINISHED WORLD."

Prof. Small's First Lecture on Sociology Delights a Large Audience. In spite of the inclement weather last evening, a large and fashionable audience gathered in the Richmond College chapel to hear Professor Albion W. Small, of Chicago University, discuss subject of "Our Unfinished World." In the audience were some of Richmond's most distinguished citizens. A section of seats had been reserved for the officers and teachers of the Woman's College and these formed a centre of attraction for many of the yourg collegians, who occupied a body of seats just opposite. Professor Small is a fluent, magnetic speaker, and possesses a fund of anecdotes, with which he aptly illustrates his dotes, with which he aptly illustrates his arguments. He held the undivided at-tention of his audience, and from the hearty applause accorded him seemed to carry his hearers with him. THE THIEF WAS SHOT Mayor Maurice of Manchester, Orders a Chicken-Catcher to Be Killed.

HIS TWO PALS SENT TO JAIL.

Six Months, While Abraham Lincoln Loses His Life -Other Items Gleaned on the South Side.

Mayor Maurice had an exciting time in his court yesterday morning. A large crowd had assembled to hear the case against Jim Jones, Garfield Jackson, William Terrell, all small colored boys, and Abraham Lincoln, a small yellow dog, which stood on the same footing with the other prisoners, and, after resting comfortably in the cell all night, with two of his comrades, sat before the Mayor, wagging his tail and wearing a complacent smile. In fact, the dog was the most important prisoner. All the evidence went to show that he was far more skilful in the chicken-burgiar business than his older comrades, and it was with an important air that the dumb thief gazed around the court-room, and looked upon the spectators in a rather condescending manner. William Terrell, who had been summoned at the request of Garfield Jackson, proved that he knew nothing whatever about the hen and nothing whatever about the hen and rooster which were stolen from J. A. F. Walden, and which were found in the possession of poor Garfield, so the Mayor promptly allowed him to go. Jim Jones, Garfield Jackson, and Abraham Lincoln, the dog, we're less fortunate, and the evidence produced showed them to be theves. But the worst was yet to come. The Mayor remarked that the dog was The Mayor remarked that the dog was apt to corrupt the morals of the community against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth, and, inasmuch as he was proven to be far more skilful in the art of chicken-catching than the boys, the smile on the dog's face changed to a deep frown, and he snarled as if some one had been stepping on his tail. Mayor sentenced him to me "shot until be was dead," and then the most pathetic appeal ever produced within the walls of the court-room was heard from Garfield Jackson in behalf of the downed Abraham. Garfield tried to reason with the Mayor, but the Court stood firm, and tenced to six months in jail, and when Garfield's sister, Alice Jackson, heard the fatal shot fired at Abraham, she was seized with a terrific fit, and fell heavily to the floor. The dusky contingent tried to hold her down, but without success, and for the time she reigned queen of the situation. The Mayor suspended the eedings while Dr. Lawrence Ingram worked on the woman, who was then in a serious condition. She was finally restored, and went to view the remains of poor Abraham Lincoln, while her brother and Jim Jones walked cheerfully was further heard and disposed of in the Police Court yesterday morning. The room was crowded with patient hearers, who stood for nearly two hours listening to the testimony. Raffaelo, a young Italian, was charged with assaulting and annoying Lenn Delasandro, a girl of the same nationality, on the street. Justice Crutchfield, when the case was first called, was at a loss to comprehend the statements of the witnesses, as, with the exception of the officers, they were mostly Italians, and spoke little English, so yesterday morning 'Squire V. Ponati was present and acted as interpreter.

Lena and her father occupied chairs near Lawyer Maury, who conducted the examination for the Commonweaith, and Raffaelo sat between his attorneys.

The feature in the examination of the witnesses was the testimony of Raffaelo who told the story from beginning to end, which was quickly translated by "Squire Donati from his mother tongue to ours. Lena's father became so enraged at times when Raffaelo was giving his testimony in Italian that he arose from his seat and uttered words long enough to hang himself by a tree, but which were only understood by the Italians present. The Justice required a policeman to stand by the father, and every time he made an effort to rise he was promptly seated.

Raffaelo toid a straightforward story of how he had met the girl at a picnic last summer, and the number of interviews he had been allowed by her visiting his shop. Finally, both were in love, and one day Lena allowed Raffaelo to cut a lock of her hair, which in Italy means betrothal. The lover used a peculiar mode of clipping the lock of dark-brown hair, as, instead of scissors, a crude shoemaker's knife was employed. All of this the girl denied, and claimed crude shoemaker's knife was employed. All of this the girl denied, and claimed that Raffaelo met her on the street, and, grabbing her, forced her to give up the lock, which meant so much, and which was shown to the Court. To conceal the origin of the lock possessed by Raffaelo, Lena's mother cut a large handful of hair from near the same place, and consequently claimed that as the cause of the bare spot on her child's head.

When all the testimony had been When all the testimony had been gathered the Justice said that but for some of Blando's own statements he would have dismissed the case, but he was convinced that the man's company with the girl was not stopped too soon, and so required him to give security of $200 for six months. This he was unable to give, and when the usual conveyance drove down to the jail with its heterogeneous contingent Raffaelo was among the lot.
